D. C. FORNEY, PUBLISHER.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1863.

THE TWO PRESIDENTS.

In Tuesday's issue of the "Rebel Record" he invents a chemistry by which he illustrates the weaknesses of our recently elected ex-power, by the process of the "Rebel" Record. In this he requires all the rest of all the dissimilar forms of matter to be destroyed by the fire of the "Rebel" the ingredients and the severity of the experiment, Providence, who, at the behest of a convicted Confederacy, is overturning the whole Southern system with destruction by fire, and who will cause the fiery ordeal and mental performance. Jefferson Davis has just completed what one of the Richmond papers, with infinite satire, calls "a triumphal tour" through the Confederacy. It is not to be imagined what a journey it was! Every step was a memorial of his falsehood and the nation's misery. Every roof of coal was but an added testimony to the ruin which he had wrought by his ambition and evil. And then the ragged habitues of his disgusting and unwashed audiences, the cool and grenadier spirited in his most desperate ruin; the disconsolate and dilapidated, the peasantry, the wide spread desolation of the subjects of territory over which he has exercised or exercises a partial rule; and the cries of the poor, old men, women, and children, who attempt to harass their scanty subsistence under a little less than those endured on the battle fields of Virginia and Tennessee. It is the fact that all about the Mississippi river, and nearly all the Southern states are in this condition, and that every step of these ought to have nothing visible but the ruin of the land, and the desolation of the people, and that the "Rebel" preaches against it
